the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased from 10.5 million to 13.5 million (15.5% of the population).

There are a number of reasons for this increase. One of the main reasons is that people are living longer. The life expectancy at birth in the UK is now 78 years for men and 82 years for women. This is an increase of 10 years since 1950.

Another reason is that people are having children later in life. This means that there are more people in the 65-74 age group than there were in the 1950s.

There are also a number of other factors that contribute to the increase in the number of people aged 65 and over. These include a decrease in the number of people who are working, and a decrease in the number of people who are retired.

The increase in the number of people aged 65 and over has a number of implications for the UK. One of the main implications is that there is a need for more social care services for older people.

There is also a need for more housing for older people. This is because many older people live in unsuitable housing, and there is a need for more accessible housing.

There is also a need for more financial support for older people. This is because many older people have low incomes, and there is a need for more financial support.

The increase in the number of people aged 65 and over is a major challenge for the UK. It is important that we take action to address the needs of older people, and to ensure that they can live well in old age.

There are a number of things that we can do to address the needs of older people. One of the main things that we can do is to provide more social care services for older people.

We can also provide more housing for older people. This can be done by building more accessible housing, and by providing more financial support for older people.

We can also provide more financial support for older people. This can be done by increasing the state pension, and by providing more financial support for older people.

There are a number of other things that we can do to address the needs of older people. These include providing more health care services for older people, and providing more education and training for older people.
